

LINKEDIN MILESTONE

I just crossed

10,000

followers.

Most of you have no idea that the UX person
you followed quietly quit UX.

That person was me.

THREE MONTHS AGO

I was known as “the UX-AI person.”

I had the title, the reputation, and the network.

I was good at it.

THE TRUTH

That was the problem.

I was bored.

Because I felt pigeonholed into thinking through one discipline, one lens.

THE TRAINING

UX shaped how I think.

I was trained to study user behavior.

And that training shaped me.

THE WIDER LENS

But I could see the whole system.

The user, yes.

But also the market. The competitors. The signals. The strategy. The incentives. The second- and third-order effects.

THE REALIZATION

I had more range.

I could feel my intellectual capabilities extending beyond the boundaries of the role
I was in.

THE TURN

So I let go and let God.

I started over.

No competitive intelligence title on my resume.

WHAT CAME WITH ME

Research.
Frameworks.
Pattern recognition.

And curiosity that would not quit.

THE INVITATION

Curiosity opened the door first.

That curiosity is part of how I became a founding member of SAI CI's Vanguard 7, a cohort shaping the future of AI-driven competitive intelligence.

Before I even had the competitive intelligence job.

THE ROLE

Then I landed the role for real.

Competitive intelligence analyst at CrowdStrike.

GRATITUDE

Thank you for helping me rise.

Some of you have challenged my thinking and sharpened my perspective.

To everyone who engages with my spicy takes, whether you agree or completely disagree, thank you. All opinions and thoughts are welcome here.

And to the people who opened doors, gave me room to grow, lifted me up, and handed me the torch: thank you.
